Increasing physical training capacity is one of the most important ways to improve the functional efficiency of the locomotor apparatus in humans. It is known, that commonly used methods of training produce a significant increase of the maximal leg muscle force without a sufficient improvement of its control. The authors used a comparative analysis to explain the effect of training on the muscular performance of the lower limbs in healthy men. Sixteen physically qualified men aged 21 to 27 were examined in 2 groups of eight people. The results of assessment were processed by a "Statistica" program. For group 1, considered as the control group, the authors used the training program used in a sports complex, on the legs, two days per week. For group 2, the training program used included a daily training of the first training day for 90 minutes. The assessment of the effectiveness of the exercise was done by means of a functional level test with a standard leg-static movement test used in clinical rehabilitation. The results obtained were analyzed statistically. The authors noted that the analysis of the exercise for the efficiency in the first group revealed a statistically significant (p = 0.05) increase in the values of the muscular performance of the legs, but not in the second group. The increase in the value of the muscular performance of the leg muscles in the first group was higher and faster than in the second. In the exercise of the second group, more serious mistakes in movements were made. It is concluded that the daily training is more efficient, but the training program used should include a daily training on the first training day.Canada is getting its own version of Netflix - and it just launched in British Columbia.
