Traditional medical treatments are being replaced by complementary and alternative medicine (CAM), and the use of CAM is steadily increasing. The Center for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) estimates that up to 50% of the US population uses some form of CAM. The specific fields of CAM that are used by an individual can vary greatly, and practitioners of CAM fields have different treatment philosophies. The suggested illnesses for which CAM is used are extremely varied, ranging from back pain to cancer, and the usage of CAM is increasing among the general public. The CAM fields include several subspecialties, such as herbalism, homeopathy, acupuncture, chiropractic medicine, ayurveda, aromatherapy, and naturopathic medicine. The consumers of CAM have a wide range of medical problems and they are often informed about the efficacy of CAM. The purpose of this study was to assess the medical training and experience of CAM practitioners and their beliefs about the safety and efficacy of CAM. The surveys were mailed to over 200 CAM practitioners in five states and received a 50% response rate. Survey questions used in this study were based on the American Medical Association (AMA) surveys. The survey data were statistically analyzed using the methods of descriptive statistics. The results show that most CAM practitioners have considerable medical training and experience with conventional medicine. Half of the CAM practitioners do not believe that CAM can prevent and cure serious illnesses. And, by and large, the more medically experienced CAM practitioners are less likely to believe in the efficacy of CAM than are those with less medical training and experience. These results indicate that it is important to understand the background and training of the CAM practitioners in order for consumers to make informed choices. One publication, U.S. Patent Publication No. 2004/0218681 to Neubauer, which is incorporated by reference herein, discloses a CAM guide used to identify and select courses of action to facilitate health promotion and disease prevention. The guide is used in an interactive computer-generated display and works by having the individual answer a series of health questions related to lifestyle, exercise, diet, medicine, weight loss, body and skin care, stress management, sleep, and smoking cessation. The information is used to provide recommendations regarding appropriate courses of action to promote individual health and wellness. Another publication, U.S. Patent Publication No.

Attachment representation in vivo and in vitro: clinical versus normative comparisons. An acute symptom picture of an infant with a history of early developmental care problems was studied. This particular infant was selected as a case study because he had been seen by a clinical staff person and diagnosed with an attachment disorder. The assumption was made that the specifics of the clinical staff person's attachment to the infant might be replicated with his/her other infant. This assumption was tested by comparisons of attachment representation in vivo and in vitro (blinded observer). The self-report questionnaires were completed by the staff members in a clinical setting. In addition, videotaped samples of the staff members' interactions with their infants were examined by four blind observers, using the Adult Attachment Interview as a measure of their own attachment representations to their infants. A comparison between the clinical and four adult samples revealed that the clinical sample exhibited a significantly lower percentage of secure attachment (p Q: Equivalent to ".ready()" function for ".readyState" In jQuery, you can test the state of a JavaScript object to see if it has finished loading/processing/etc. For example: $.ajax({ ... complete: function() { //do something } }); Is there anything similar for JavaScript objects without jQuery (e.g. HTML5 FileReader), or does the browser just have to wait until the whole DOM is loaded before testing for ready state? A: If you want to detect when the whole page has finished loading, you could use: window.addEventListener("load",function(){ alert("page has loaded"); }); The above will alert
