us. A life and a hell and a half, actually. The first was free form. The second was far too structured. The third was just too many people. On the last of these occasions we were required to wander the streets of Oxford for an hour and a half. It was entirely, and completely, unsatisfying. I find being told that I can't do something interesting. No matter what I do, if I can't explicitly declare that I'm doing what I'm doing for performance, I'm doing it for a reason that I don't want to talk about, I'm not against the idea

Active.Q: Using the Value property to access the selected value in a dropdown list I have a dropdownlist control on my page that is bound to a List of a Model class. I have a textbox on the page that is bound to the same List in the Model. I need to access the selected value in the dropdown list to call a function. I have tried the Value property, but it is always null. What I am doing is returning the Model from my method and using the SelectedItem to access the dropdownlist. (This is because the dropdownlist is the selected item, but I don't know until it is selected.) This is where I am setting the dropdownlist: public List SomeModelClassList() { List list = _someModelClassManager.GetModelClassList(); return list; } This is where I am accessing the selected item: [Authorize] [HttpGet] public ActionResult Index() { 0cc13bf012

I got my Catherine: Full Body from PlayStation Store without a problem,.North America's development agency is starting to put its massive pile of data to work, thanks to the launch of its first Open Datasets portal. Aiming to create a unified store of open government data from across the country's public agencies, the Canadian government's new Open Datasets portal will give users direct access to datasets in a number of government databases, letting them build apps and applications with the data straight from within a web browser. While these datasets - which the agency has been releasing in an increasing number to the public at large since May - have been a bit hard to access, that's changing. The portal now includes an easy way for anyone to access the data, pulling it from servers at Statistics Canada and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, and making it available to anyone who wants to read it (though they must be set up with an API key). It also includes a search tool that lets users find the datasets they're looking for, as well as the ability to sort, filter and create customized lists of datasets. So far, the agency has made 10 datasets available, including government-issued census records and data from the Canada-Wide Land Cover System, and resources for the country's waterways. While the portal already offers a number of major datasets, like the latest national census information and federal government health data, new datasets will be added throughout the year, as the government's Digital Government Strategy demands. The agency said earlier this month that it plans to continue to update the portal as it makes new datasets available, and open to developers, with the aim of making it an official store of government data that anyone can access.
