“The new HyperMotion technology helps us better understand the way football is played today,” explained Andrew Yip, producer at Electronic Arts. “We want to help players master the subtle on-ball movements required for modern football matches.” The data is translated into movement models that control players’ on-ball body movements in real time. “We then use these models to create the movements of players as they run, pass, shoot, dribble, slide, tackle, shoot, perform a through-ball or recover the ball,” Yip said. FIFA 22 uses the server-side data to gain a better feel for the players’ strength and stamina, as well as pace. But it goes beyond that, to also explore how well a player can “feel”

when he uses his preferred passing style. In the new passing game, players use a mix of short, accurate passes and long, precise passes that are delivered with the best touch possible. “It’s important to understand the importance of touch when passing as the difference between a good pass and a bad pass can be the difference between a team winning or losing a football match,” Yip said. The new passing game also adds “drift” into the mix, a subtle, subtle touch that tells the passer his target is closing in fast and “not liking that pass,” Yip said. With these new additions to FIFA 22, players will be able to influence games in a much more open and tactical way. FIFA 22 also includes an array of new faces and new coaches. EA hopes to engage fans by introducing classic, licensed players from the past as well as a full staff of coaches. The new “Exile” mode introduces a new way for players to gain star potential and forge their club in a new country. If a player becomes a star at a new club, he could stay a star in FIFA's virtual world, regardless of the star's success with their club. Player character models have been updated to reflect the way players naturally move, with slightly more exaggerated joints and poses. The "My Player" mode also returns as a new feature in FIFA 22, allowing players to switch between their own custom-created player and specific club players, and make their player reflect their club. What's new in Fifa 22:

- NEWS: 17 NEW PLAYERS and Enhanced Skills: The latest edition of FIFA introduces 17 new All-Stars, including 17-time World Cup winner and 2015 FIFA Ballon d'Or recipient Miroslav Klose. New features include ratings for the new "Enhanced Tactics" where players can earn or lose player ratings based on their performance on the pitch, including improved ball control; dribbling and pace; passing; first touch; receiving and heading; and shooting. FIFA 20 introduces the significant new action of REACTION, which will be introduced later this year with Madden 25, FIFA 23 and other EA SPORTS games. REACTION allows players to instantly go into training mode before or after a live game. This will allow players to observe and learn player tendencies, while actively practicing the aspects of playing their own style of the real-life football game.
