A proof of work block chain works by incentivizing miners to find a hash on a search space for which there is no proof of work (of anything else). You know this because there is a nonce involved and one must be provided by the miner to be able to produce a hash. Since the miners are incentivized only to find a nonce, they can not be rewarded to actually solve this search space. In the average case they would need to solve this search space every second of every day over the next several years. It is impossible. A pure proof of work model does not have this type of problem as it does not require that the miners find a random piece of information and only doing that with approximately equal probability. Instead, they are incentivized to find a random solution for which there is a proof of work (such as another block). The result is a proof of work chain that keeps growing and growing to c6a93da74d
